The book is divided into three sections, each of which takes its title from a different type of anaphora. Anaphora is a rhetorical device in which a word or phrase is repeated at the beginning of successive lines or clauses. In the first section, "Anaphora of the Body," Carson uses anaphora to create a sense of intimacy and longing. The poems in this section explore the physicality of love, the desire for connection, and the pain of loss.

The second section, "Anaphora of the Mind," takes a more intellectual approach to love and loss. The poems in this section explore the ways in which we think about and remember our experiences. Carson uses anaphora to create a sense of recursion, as if the poems are constantly circling back on themselves, trying to make sense of the past.

The third section, "Anaphora of the Soul," is the most experimental and challenging of the three. The poems in this section explore the nature of the soul and the afterlife. Carson uses anaphora to create a sense of mystery and wonder, as if the poems are reaching for something beyond our understanding.

Throughout the book, Carson's language is both precise and lyrical. She uses a wide range of vocabulary, from the colloquial to the academic, to create a rich and textured tapestry of sound and meaning. Her poems are full of unexpected juxtapositions and surprising turns of phrase, which keep the reader constantly engaged.
