In the early 1960s, Davis became actively involved in the burgeoning civil rights movement. She joined the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), a grassroots organization dedicated to nonviolent direct action against racial segregation. Davis participated in numerous protests and demonstrations, including the famous 1963 March on Washington.

Her commitment to social justice led her to work closely with other prominent activists, such as Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X. Davis's intellect, passion, and fearlessness earned her respect within the movement and beyond.

As the civil rights movement progressed, Davis became increasingly disillusioned with its reliance on nonviolence. She began to embrace the radical ideas of the Black Power movement, which advocated for self-defense and armed resistance against systemic oppression.

In 1969, Davis married George Jackson, a fellow activist who was imprisoned for murder. Jackson's death in prison under suspicious circumstances further fueled Davis's determination to fight against the injustices of the criminal justice system.

Davis's vocal support for Black Power and her association with the Black Panthers made her a target of government surveillance and harassment. In 1970, she was falsely accused of aiding in a murder and was placed on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List.

Davis spent 16 months in jail awaiting trial. During this time, she endured solitary confinement, physical abuse, and psychological torture. Despite the adversity she faced, Davis remained defiant and unyielding in her beliefs.

In 1972, Davis was acquitted of all charges. Her trial and imprisonment had sparked an international movement for her release, and her acquittal was a victory for the civil rights movement as a whole.

Following her release, Davis continued to be an outspoken advocate for social justice. She has authored numerous books and lectured extensively on issues such as race, gender, poverty, and the prison-industrial complex.
