The old man sat in his hospital bed, staring out the window. He had been there for weeks, and he was starting to feel lonely and forgotten. He had no visitors, and the nurses were too busy to spend much time with him.

One day, a young nurse came into his room. She was new to the hospital, and she was eager to help. She sat down next to the old man and asked him how he was doing.

The old man sighed. "I'm lonely," he said. "I have no one to talk to."

The nurse smiled. "I can talk to you," she said. "My name is Sarah."

The old man smiled back. "Thank you," he said. "My name is John."

Sarah and John talked for hours that day. They talked about their lives, their families, and their dreams. John told Sarah about his wife, who had passed away a few years ago. Sarah told John about her husband, who was a doctor. They talked about their children and grandchildren. They talked about their hopes and fears for the future.

As the days went by, Sarah and John became close friends. They visited each other every day, and they talked about everything under the sun. John told Sarah about his life as a young man. He told her about his time in the war, and he told her about his career as a businessman. Sarah told John about her life as a young woman. She told him about her dreams of becoming a doctor, and she told him about her struggles as a single mother.

John and Sarah learned a lot from each other. They learned about each other's cultures, and they learned about each other's values. They learned about the importance of family, and they learned about the importance of friendship.

One day, John was discharged from the hospital. Sarah was sad to see him go, but she knew that he was ready to go home. John thanked Sarah for her friendship, and he promised to stay in touch.

John and Sarah kept in touch for many years. They wrote letters to each other, and they visited each other whenever they could. They were friends until the end, and they both cherished the time they had together.
